Comment text:

For some time the government has been pledging to "level up" opportunity within the UK, yet the proposed new boundaries will actually remove a couple of seats from disadvantaged areas in the North and West , instead adding nearly ten new parliamentary seats in the South and South East. The S and SE areas are the richest parts of UK so the nett effect of the changes will introduce further bias which significantly benefits the representation of the Conservative vote. I believe the absence of a fair electoral system has substantially degraded our democracy on many occasions, and that many of the sins that have been visited on this country have been as a result of our ancient and stagnating First Past The Post electoral system.

I therefore think tinkering at boundary edges is unlikely to fix our problems, whereas a move towards proportional representation would, at the very least, be fairer than what is presently on offer.
